Trazando el culto de Santiago el Mayor en Inglaterra durante la Edad Media: desde mediados del siglo XI hasta mediados del siglo XIV

Resumen: Este estudio es el resultado de la investigación del impacto que el culto a Santiago el Mayor y la peregrinación a Compostela tuvieron en el paisaje arquitectónico de Inglaterra durante la Edad Media y la relación de las dedicaciones jacobeanas inglesas con las vías de comunicación existentes en aquel momento. La cronología en la que se enmarca este trabajo, de la segunda mitad del siglo XI a mediados del siglo XIV, no significa una acotación exacta, ya que se han tenido en cuenta las fundaciones jacobeanas del período anterior, y las fechas de muchos de los edificios estudiados resultan confusas. Los principales objetivos de esta investigación son demostrar de una manera visual la existencia de una devoción compostelana consolidada ya desde época temprana y, además, servir como herramienta que ayude a visualizar los posibles itinerarios de los peregrinos jacobeanos a través de la Inglaterra medieval.

Mapping the cult of St James the Great in England during the Middle Ages: from the second half of the 11th century until the middle of the 14th century.

Abstract: This study is the result of an investigation into the impact that the cult of St James the Great and the pilgrimage to Compostela had on the architectural landscape of England during the Middle Ages, as well as the relationship between English Jacobean dedications and the routes of communication existent at that time. The chronological period that frames this work, from the second half of the XI century to the middle of the XIV century, does not form a literal delimitation as foundations prior to this period have also been considered and the dates of several buildings registered are confused. The main objectives of this investigation are to demonstrate, in a visual way, the long-established existence of a solid Compostelanean devotion and also, to serve as a device which helps to visualise the plausible itineraries of the Jacobean pilgrims throughout medieval England.

Resumo: Este estudo é o resultado da investigación do impacto que o culto a Santiago o Maior e a peregrinación a Compostela tiveron na paisaxe arquitectónica de Inglaterra durante a Idade Media e a relación das dedicacións xacobeas inglesas coas vías de comunicación existentes naquel momento. A cronoloxía na que se enmarca este traballo, da segunda metade do século XI ata mediados do XIV, non significa unha delimitación exacta, xa que se tiveron en conta as fundacións xacobeas do período anterior, e as datas de moitos dos edificios estudados resultan confusas. Os principais obxectivos desta investigación son demostrar dunha maneira visual a existencia dunha devoción compostelá consolidada xa desde época temperá e, ademais, servir como ferramenta que axude a visualizar os posibles itinerarios dos peregrinos xacobeos a través da Inglaterra medieval.

Notes on the map of the cult of St James

‘[... The dedications of] S. James is to be found in every county of England, unless with the single exception of Rutland. Altogether he has over 550 churches, of which about 330 are ancient’².

The map resulting from this investigation is the cartographical representation of a database created from the religious architecture dedicated to St James in medieval England, together with a reconstruction of the insular routes of communication in existence at that time³. Although the focus of this study is the period comprising the second half of the 11th century until the middle of the 14th century, it is not limited to this timeframe. With the purpose of acquiring a further understanding of the proliferation of Jacobean buildings in the context of medieval insular England, foundations prior to the 11th century have also been considered. The chronology of many buildings has been a major issue throughout this investigation as much of the registered architecture has been lost or completely rebuilt. Thus in numerous cases, the dates offered by the sources consulted belong to the contemporary buildings, where dates of previous foundations have not been available.

This investigation aims to demonstrate visually the enormous magnitude of the influence that the cult of the apostle had on the English architectural topography during the Middle Ages. With the study of the insular medieval routes, this work also intends to serve as a tool for future studies of English medieval pilgrimage.

The first step undertaken during this study was to investigate the field of religious foundations, parish churches and religious houses, including hospitals, dedicated to St James in order to produce a register of dedications, incorporated as an appendix at the end of this paper. The buildings were then geographically recorded using software for editing digital maps.

The inventory of insular Jacobean buildings originates from five principal sources. First, the study conducted by Frances Arnold-Forster, Studies in Church Dedications or England's Patron Saints published in 1899, in which Arnold-Forster collated the dedications of over fourteen thousand English churches in a tabular format. This publication is still used today as a reference work and useful tool for the study of insular ecclesiastical dedications. The surveys of religious houses created by the bishop of St Asaph, Thomas Tanner (1674-1735), entitled Notitia monastica, or, A Short

2 Arnold-Forster, Frances, Studies in church dedications, vol. I (London, 1899) 86.

3 This map will be reconstructed for the project Jacobean England (www.jacobeanengland.com). This is a digital programme which aims to become an electronic corpus of the Jacobean material culture of England dated between ca.1100 and ca.1350. The expected activation of Jacobean England will be in January of 2017.

History of the Religious Houses in England and Wales, dated in 1695 and by David Knowles and R. Neville Hadcock, Medieval Religious Houses, England and Wales, published in 1971. While in Tanner's publication there are a number of omissions, Knowles and Hadcock compiled an accurate list of houses of monks, regular canons, friars, nuns, military orders and hospitals⁴. Finally, the recent contributions gathered in the databases of National Heritage List for England and the encyclopaedia Victoria History of the Counties of England (1899-present day).

To construct a register of English dedications to St James the buildings' basic information comprising the name, location (parish and county) and foundation dates was extracted from the above sources. Two main obstacles arose during the production of the inventory of Jacobean English establishments namely, the foundation dates and the name of the patron saint associated with the buildings.

As mentioned, the dates of the medieval constructions are unclear, especially for the parish churches registered only by Arnold-Forster, as the scholar classified all the buildings established prior to the Reformation in the same group without further chronological details. However, wherever possible, the dates for all churches and religious houses were compared with the other main authorities, Medieval Religious Houses, England and Wales, the National Heritage List for England and the encyclopaedia Victoria History of the Counties of England, as they were more specific relying on references to original sources.

Regarding the name of the patron saint of the foundations, St James, there were two disciples of Christ with that name in the New Testament⁵, St James son of Zebedee, or St James the Great, and St James son of Alphaeus, also known as St James the Less⁶. In the list of the religious buildings found at the end of this paper it is noticeable that the name of the patron saint in a great majority of the cases is simply 'St James'. Therefore, there is a possibility that many of the buildings included in the catalogue, whose dedication does not specify which of the apostles they refer to, could be related to St James the Less, and not to Compostela's patron saint.

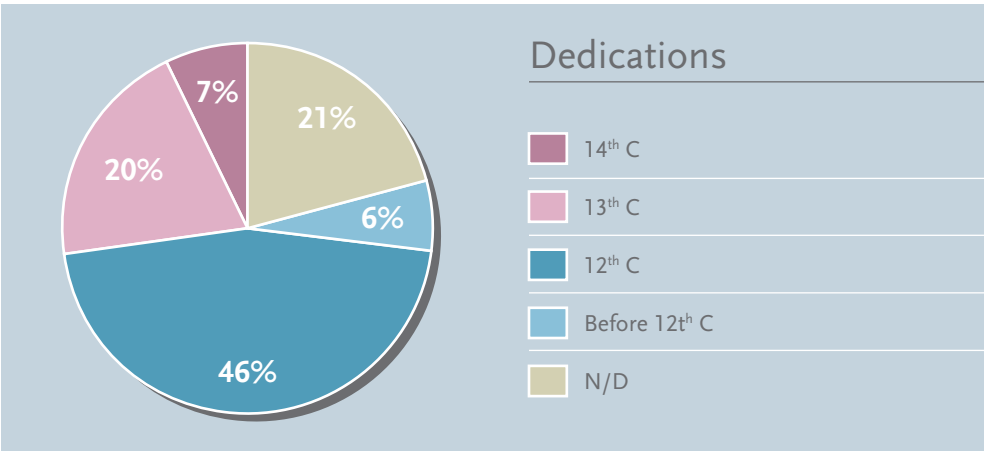

Although the main purpose of the inventory is to register the foundations of St James in England during the middle ages, information regarding the medieval dedications is rather scant and more so for parish churches. As most of the dedications given by the main sources belong to the current patron saints and in many cases to track back previous dedications would be impossible, it has to taken into account that many of the contemporary Jacobean dedications could well have a different saint as their original patron and also that many other current dedications could originally have been dedicated to St James.

To date, a total of 355 Jacobean foundations have been found in England dated from before the 12th century until the middle of the 14th century. As can be seen in Graphic 1, taking into account that the date of nearly one quarter of the dedications remains confused (N/D: not defined), almost half of the churches and religious houses dedicated to St James established during this investigation were founded in the 12th century indicating a clear peak in construction during this time. This figure is more notable when compared to the number of previous foundations, specifically a total of twenty churches and religious houses.

Graphic 1: Percentages of Jacobean foundations established in England up until the 14th century.

Graphic 2: Number of churches, chapels, religious houses dedicated to the apostle established in England up until the 14th century.

As Graphic 2 shows, the majority of the English buildings dedicated to the apostle established during the 12th century belong to churches, which were also the predominant Jacobean construction during the period studied. Furthermore, it was also during this time when hospitals, chapels, and religious houses primarily emerged, while after the 13th century, their number tends to decrease practically disappearing in the 14th century.

Once the geographical references of the Jacobean buildings were registered on the map, the next stage was to recreate the medieval road system and analyse its correspondence with the principal ports linked with pilgrimage to Compostela in England during the time, Dover, Poole, Bristol, Plymouth, Dartmouth and Southampton⁷. To investigate the existence of pilgrimage routes in Britain during the Middle Ages it has been necessary to study first the medieval transport network, as pilgrims would probably prefer to travel using well-known previously established and above all safe courses. But a study of the roads extant during the medieval period has not been easy due to the lack of both primary sources as well as contemporary investigations and publications⁸.

The medieval systems of communication in England were formed through the combination of prehistoric, Roman and early medieval passages⁹. During the time interval pertinent to this investigation, a more or less stable long-distance road system, which would permit fluent circulation of diplomatic, military, ecclesiastic and commercial traffic, must have existed in Britain. The reasons for its existence can be glimpsed in two indicators. First, the rapidity and efficiency of the Domesday Book's compilation. This invaluable register was compiled within a period of around one year at the order of King William I (ca.1028-1087), who, during the Christmas Council of 1085, decided to send his men throughout his new kingdom to assemble fiscal information about his possessions. The possible existence of previous administrative registers has been suggested as a reason for the rapidity of the document's collation¹⁰, but until now nobody has related this to an efficient communication network

7 The ports of Bristol and Southampton, together with the harbours of Lynn, Boston and London, were also the principal economical English ports during the Middle Ages. Unwin, T., 'Towns and trade 1066-1500' in An historical geography of England and Wales (London, 1990) 123.

8 To my knowledge this subject was only studied by Brian Paul Hindle and Christopher Taylor. The academic vacuum in the study of the medieval road systems draws attention to the importance that they had towards having a better understanding about the development of the towns and markets during the Middle Ages. Unwin, T., 'Towns and trade 1066-1500' in An historical geography of England and Wales (London, 1990) 144. Hindle, B. system which would permit King William's administrators safe and uninterrupted movement among counties, castles and towns.

The reconstruction of the road system existing in medieval England presented in this work is based on the study of two main sources of information. First, the map dated ca.1360 known as the Gough Map as cartographic evidence, and second, the insular travel itineraries of King Edward I (1239-1307) during the first ten years of his reign, indicating individual movement throughout medieval England.

In the Gough Map¹¹, preserved in the Bodleian Libraries, a grid of lines are represented which seem to connect certain towns, castles, monasteries and cities, which could indicate the existence of roads¹². The information presented by these lines was extracted and transformed into cartographical data and transferred onto the map as evidence of existing routes of communication in medieval England.

At that time monarchs were nomadic figures, moving constantly together with their entourage throughout their kingdoms. Their itineraries, which were well documented as for example with King Edward I¹³, shows that a complex road system must have existed in medieval England in order to accommodate a considerable number of people and cargo. Pilgrims travelling to the ports of England in order to sail to the European continent and then on to Compostela could also use this transport network.

Conclusions

It can be seen from the data collected in this study and the resulting map that buildings devoted to St James largely started to proliferate on the insular English landscape in the 12th century, around the time when Compostela was elevated to apostolic see. Prior to this, the records show only twenty buildings with Jacobean devotion. It would seem possible that this event raised the saint's profile throughout England, perhaps as a result of increased awareness through relative proximity and associated pilgrimage to what became one of the most fashionable religious destinations in West Europe. News about the cathedral, which was then immersed in an intense building programme, would have reached England via travellers, pilgrims and itinerant artists, such as masons and craftsmen. Also, with the Norman civilisation establishing itself in England bringing European customs and integrating them into their new kingdom, insular popularity of the Jacobean cult would have experienced a significant stimulus.

If the cult's popularity was solely as a result of pilgrimage, it might be expected that St James's buildings would predominantly feature in the proximity of coastal ports where ships embarked with pilgrims for Europe. However, as can be seen on the map, there are many buildings inland as well as on the coast, particularly in southern and central England¹⁴. This southern focus may be a result of population density, which is beyond the scope of this article, or the cult's influence decreasing further away from the principal pilgrimage ports, which were in the southwest. However it does demonstrate that the cult was widely disseminated throughout England indicating that these buildings arose as a result of an established local devotion.

Regarding the routes of communication extracted from the study of the Gough Map and the itineraries of King Edward I, it can be seen that during the time frame under investigation, England had an established travel network connecting the principal urban centres with harbours and also the Jacobean dedications registered in this work.

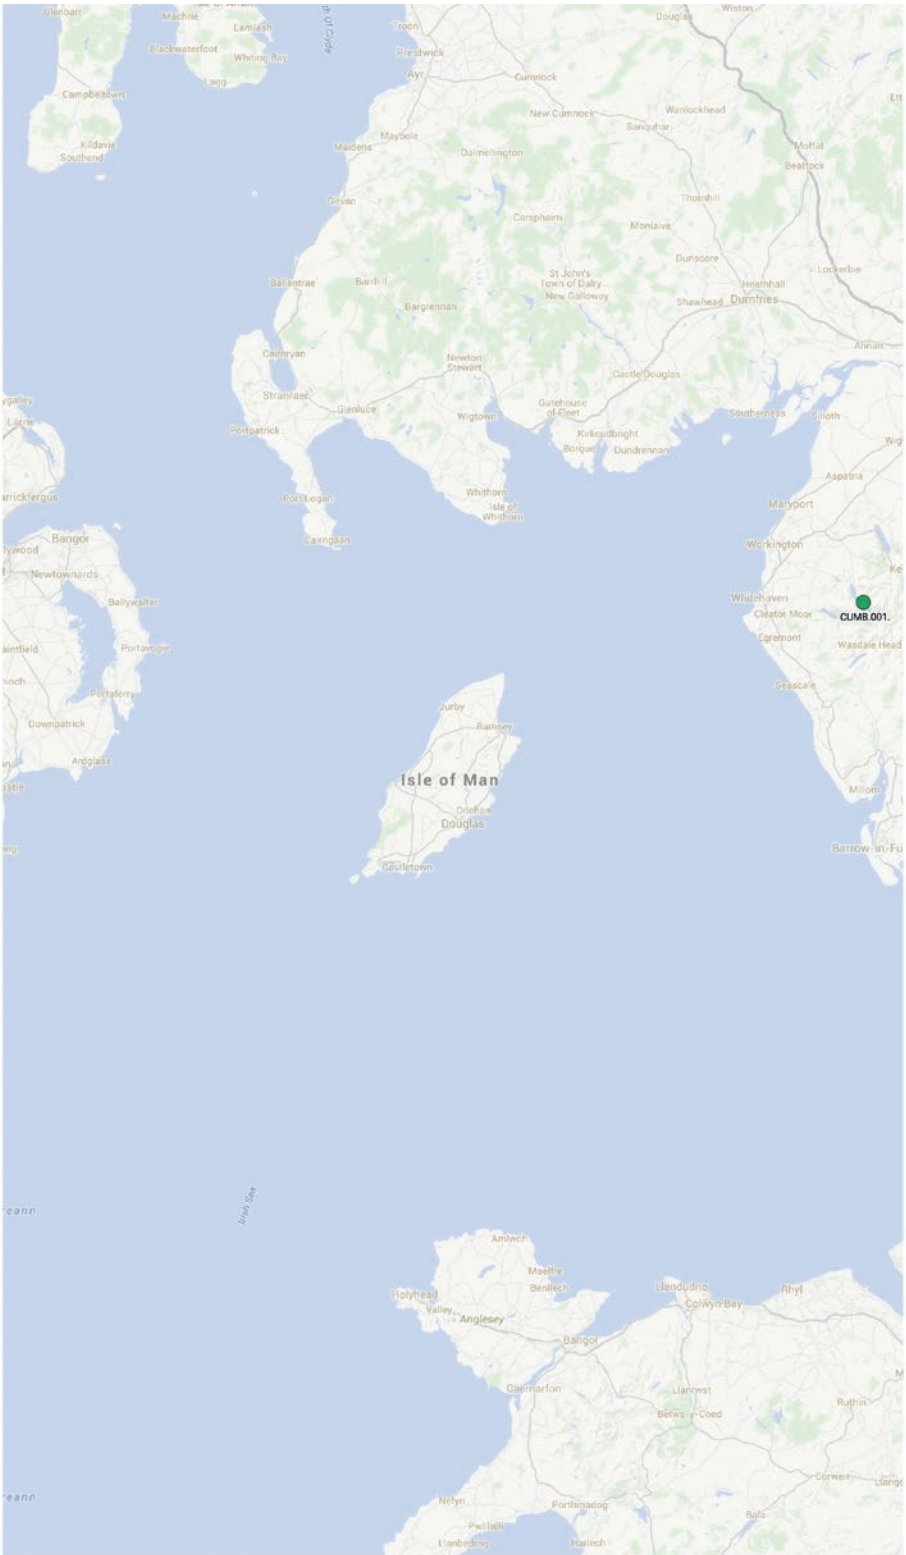

The map created through this study demonstrates that the cult of St James had an important impact on the topographical architecture of England during the Middle Ages. From the second half of the 11th century to the middle of the 14th century, a great number of buildings with dedications to St James were established in the kingdom, mostly in its south centre. Although there is no evidence that the various Jacobean dedications presented in this work are directly related to pilgrimage and it is likely that medieval pilgrims would have chosen the most convenient routes and ports to travel to the European mainland, these buildings established on or near existing roads and other travel routes would have offered the traveller a means of preparing themselves both physically and spiritually on their way to the harbour towns where they would set sail to Santiago de Compostela to show their devotion to St James the Great.

14 Gloucestershire with 27 (together with the buildings in Bristol), Somerset with 14, Wiltshire with 13 and Herefordshire with 10, in the insular west; Northamptonshire with 16, Cambridgeshire with 12 and Oxfordshire with 10, in the centre; Norfolk with 12 and Essex with 10, in the east; and last, Kent with 15, Devon with 14 and Sussex with 13, in the south. Although with two exceptions, Yorkshire and Lincolnshire with 25 and 16; these numbers differ from the quantity of the foundations established in the counties of the north of the country, such as Durham with 2, Northumberland with 5, or Dorset with 2.
